ST. CATHERINE'S ASCENSION.

This is a tender poem, contributed to the Boston Transcript, and suggested by Mucke's picture of St. Catherine borne to heaven by angels.

The martyr's sword beneath her feet shall win for her the praise sweet of Him who holds her martyr's crown.

Rural life has always a charm—a romance which clings around it, especially to one whose childhood was free and happy amid the society of brooks and vales and foliage and pleasing rural haunts.

One summer day, I tired of wondering where this trout stream ran to, for, like the "Brook" of Tennyson, there was a poetic romance about it which was irresistible.

Over the top of the stream, as it deepened into the forest, hung the birch and elm, forming a continuous shade and vista down which my eyes peered with all the admiration of a young poetic soul.

As the descent grew steeper, the roughness of the banks compelled me to leave the shore and clamor around a distance of a few rods, when I again came full upon the stream and beheld the pouring waters, the sound of which had grown more and more distinct as I approached.

At the foot of the fall stood the ruin of an old mill, the stones growing over with moss and weeds, while a little green plot of grass and wild flowers spread out before it.

Many a year later, I strayed again to the thicket and the fall, still hidden in the depth of a large forest. There lay the old millstone—a tree of considerable size growing through it, and the wild flowers and the brambles were thicker and coarser. The ruins suddenly called to mind the incidents of the former visit, so long before that the precise time was not recalled; but before I left my eye fell upon the following inscription:

FOUND A HAT, AND LOST MY HEART. S. S. Just below, cut in a similar style, by the chiseling of a piece of quartz, was—LOST MY HAT, NOT FOUND MY HEART. A. B.
